

The pandemic is changing people's lives in different ways for the worse. During this pandemic, people lose something and some are suffering. Arguably, one of the main problems in Cambodia and perhaps around the world is: people losing their jobs, losing a way to support their lives. This project explores the theory of Universal Basic Income(UBI) and how it perhaps could help people in Cambodia and the world get out of financial problems during a time like this. UBI is a theoretical government public program that provides periodic payment to all citizens without means of work or test. With UBI in practice, people's financial situation will improve. Additionally, if people are unemployed, they can still survive living off the government's money. The government could ask each family what their estimated average salary is. If it is under the normal average salary of a Cambodian, then they would provide aid money to the family.

By doing this, more families will be able to live off well. They perhaps might even take more risks since they know that if they fail they have the government's support.
